In a movie I'm translating two men are gathered after some time. The first one says that he is now establishing himself, having a wife and two children. "Do you have any?" He asks the other guy. "Nothing for me," answers the other man. There is some difference between your answer and just saying: "No, I do not (have any)"? What is he putting pressure on saying what he said? Or are the two interchangeable responses? Please explain. None for me is what is said to refuse an offer: "You want a little beer" - "none for me, thank you". So, maybe he's saying he deliberately refused to have children. Thank you, Keith, for your explanation. Hi Garin, KB is certain, it is clear, in which if you are offered something and you do not want, you say "none for me (thanks)." However, I think that the speakers ae, particularly, will not find it unusual to hear "none for me" colloquially in this type of context as meaning "as to me, I do not have any", without necessarily , which means "I do not want any". Here are some examples. Other respondents answered "no", "no", "not yet", "I do not want any", and so on. What to do for work? Currently they do not work, really need a job, but having a hard time finding one that works with my schedule and yours. aide diet on a hospital supervisor and the photo in cvs children? None for me. (Source: Quora.com) So, I do not think "none for me" in his context necessarily means that he does not want any, although he could certainly. Probably better wait for the entrance of a and ae speaker. Last edition: November 18, 2016 I'm with Keith on this subject. I would say "none for me" means that he refused to have any. And generally with attached "thanks". I'm with EnquiringMind: I take the man as saying nothing more than "I do not have children." I'm with EnquiringMind: I take the man as saying nothing more than "I do not have children." I think this is a case of "you had to be there" in order to make the distinction. I think very much depends on body language and voice tone when you talk. I can see this happening anyway. Garin, you are translating from a document or from a dialogue? Garin, are you translating from a document or a dialogue recording? Well, I'm translating from a list of dialogues, but I'll have the opportunity to check my translation against the video later. I think I will use some neutral translation and - if necessary - change it according to tone, body language, etc. In Veheo, then. Anyway, thank you all for sharing your thoughts with me.
