Launched in 2011, this relaxed sports tourer tapped into a new market segment that wanted the upright riding position offered by a naked bike combined with the practicality of a tourer. But, crucially, they demanded all this without compromising in terms of sporty handling. However to ensure that the SX doesn't get all linear and dull, Kawasaki purposely added in a kick in power at 7000rpm to give the rider a bit of a thrill. But, again very cleverly, a secondary balancer shaft which the Z1000 also has driven off the crankshaft reduces engine vibration, ensuring a smooth ride at motorway speeds while not totally eliminating all vibes as a bit of a buzz gives a bike some character. Constructed from five cast aluminum pieces steering stem, left and right frames and two cross pieces the frame is also very light and is designed to transmit some vibrations from the motor to the rider. While three of the four engine mounting points are rigid, the upper rear crankcase mount is rubber, allowing a bit of feeling through vibration to escape. Mass centralisation played a major part in the SX's frame's design to give the SX sporty yet still assured handling. Like the Z1000, the SX features a horizontal backlink suspension system that positions the shock and linkage above the swingarm. Kawasaki claimed this design not only helps the bike's mass centralisation, it also prevents the exhaust overheating the shock and affecting its operation. The shock has stepless rebound adjustment and a cam-style preload adjuster. The rear runs a single piston caliper with a 250mm petal disc.

ABS was an optional extra in 2011 it arrived as standard fitment in 2016 and added 3kg to the bike's 228kg wet weight. Heated grips were also an optional extra. The SX's grips are 10mm more inward when compared to the Z1000 and the rider's pegs are rubber mounted and rubber covered to reduce vibration. The screen can be set in three different positions, spanning a 20-degree angle, and the 19-litre tank is steel to allow the use of magnetic tank bags. And as if that wasn't enough, the SX's fairing is flaired to deflect heat escaping from the motor away from the rider's legs and its leading edges are slanted to direct wind flow around the bike. The only downside is the seat, which some owners feel lacks padding. It was a surprise hit and stole quite a few sales from its naked sibling, the Z1000. It had its faults, the most noticeable of which was the lack of electronic assists such as power modes and traction control, but after riders gave it such a positive reaction these issues were quickly addressed by Kawasaki in its 2014 update. This is a really solid tourer that can certainly be enjoyed in the bends and is also extremely adept at covering big miles. The riding position is wonderfully upright and relaxed and it's also a pleasant place for pillions to spend time provided you buy the optional extra gel seat, which is always a good thing on a tourer. If you are after a sporty tourer, the SX remains a great buy, however in a modern context its lack of electronic assists is a bit disappointing. Nowadays you expect traction control to be on a large capacity bike and that is the one area the SX is left lacking. If this doesn't bother you, buy one with hard luggage fitted and get out there and explore the world. If it does, buy the 2014onwards version, which has KTRC as standard and optional ABS.

A remap and race exhaust will increase it from a frustrating 38mpg area to into the mid40s, so these alterations are worth looking out for if you are planning on using it for touring. It was updated again in 2016 when it gained an assist and slipper clutch, with a 30% lighter lever action, ABS as standard and new colour options. It was further updated in 2017 when it received more advanced rider aids that included an IMU, allowing it to feature anglesensitive traction control and ABS for the first time. The shock linkage was also updated to lower the bike and add stability to its handling and its styling was changed with LED lights. In response to owner's comments, the seat's padding was increased, pillion grab rails redesigned, clocks updated and the screen made 15mm taller while the bodywork grew 28mm wider to improve wind protection. The mirrors' stalks were also extended by 20mm. Bennetts Motorcycling Services Limited is authorised and regulated by the Financial Conduct Authority reg no. 913949.
