Duplo 645 Service Manual

It may not display this or other websites correctly. You should upgrade or use an alternative browser. We are a small pvc card shop. We bought a KM C3070 to print in house and have more control on rush job. In the best world i would only do this on the machine and keep it simple but my boss want to offer business card flyers and menu to our customers. Since i will do it all and wanted something simple to use with my lack of experience i think the Duplo machine is a perfect to begin with. The KM come with ic314 running Creo color server. In the finisfini setting i can select the dc645 and it will add bar code and registration mark. What i dont know is how this new template that is best fit or manual imposition is transferred to the dc645 Or is it possible to import all the imposition template from the dc645 job creation software to the creo. Is there any software with the dc645 to do imposition and export to pdf. Also we buy a dc645 yo begin because of price and need. Thank you for your help. I think what i need is a good imposition software. As for the machine i found a good deal in canada but its used and have no warranty i must find if i can get a service contract for it. I think what you getting as far as Duplo software is somewhat imposition software that you create the template in, use it to drop in your images and print out of it. If you dont need to change jobs too often, you can program and save number of jobs in to machine, then generic imposition software will do but youd need to adjust with the machine VIA trial and error. I can make template in the duplo software and then make imposition yo match it. By they i gogot a brand new dc616 pro it will do for us and got a good price at the Graphic canada show. I would make my imposition in Impose, then create the template in the Duplo software. I also suggest not using the barcode reader. It slows it down significantly because it reads each sheet. <http://ruxthai.com/userfiles/dcr-sr57e-manual.xml> browser. Unlike any in the industry, the DC646 slits, cuts, creases and perforates documents in a single pass up to 30 sheets per minute while your operators are busy working with other equipment. The scanner also reads registration marks, correcting the sheet-by-sheet image shift and delivering accurately finished pieces every time. Barcodes and registration marks can be easily applied with the EFI Fiery Command Workstation or Fiery System 10 or newer. It can take a full 650x370mm sheet up to 350gsm and deliver a wide array of completed products. Furthermore automated set up, bar code reader and CCD camera to ensure accurate register mean that less experienced operators can deliver high quality finished products.

The optional business card module makes light work of a highly popular product type. A 100mm input tray means that the unit can run unattended. Trim removal to a waste bin keeps the environment clean. CCD camera ensures that creases and trims are placed in precisely the right place, keeping any waste to an absolute minimum. There are several machines available to help with further automating projects for the smallest print shop. MBM and Duplo both have an automated slitter, cutter and creaser that can automate what would once be a manual process on three different machines. Of course, from the end user perspective or to that of the small business owner, these technical details spell the difference between hundreds of dollars in savings or the potential for long term gains. In the printing business, efficiency and streamlining issues such as wastage and additional processing input take not only time but also valuable resources. When taken in the longer run these could account for a significant amount of money.

This is an essential factor when comparing the MBM Aerocut G2 with the Duplo DC 645. While the DC 645 could handle 26 sheets per minute and the G2 could handle 20, it would be noteworthy to highlight that the G2 handles an additional process in that it could also score and perforate aside from the standard slit, cut and crease that the DC 645 does. The DC 645 uses a belt suction system while the G2 uses an air suction system. However, the main difference is in the G2 which incorporates a nifty feature that allows for an automatic reversal and auto refeed system for correcting errors. This is a crucial point in a creaser that could save any job order a lot of time. The main advantage of the Aerocut G2 is that it is an all in one solution that is sold as is. The DC 645 sells the machine on a modular basis meaning you have to purchase additional components for specific requirements. This is a key deciding factor that should not be overlooked. For one, the additional cost introduces another factor into the equation. For small job orders or for the small business, this could mean the difference between profitability or loss. Their performances are almost at par with each other save for a few minor technical differences. Both could be a valuable asset that could improve your operations through the streamlining of specific finishing functions. How each would suit your requirements would totally be up to you.
